Dear Editor,

The retirement of healthcare professionals marks a significant milestone after years dedicated to the care and well-being of others. Their tireless efforts and invaluable contributions have left an indelible mark on the healthcare landscape (1, 2). Additionally, their positive influence extended beyond patients and colleagues to policymakers and the general population, underscoring the importance of recognizing and appreciating their impact (3, 4).

As the healthcare industry evolves, it is increasingly important to acknowledge and honor the accomplishments and expertise of retired healthcare professionals (4-6). Globally, various strategies have been implemented to recognize and support healthcare retirees, including recognition ceremonies, retirement celebrations, personalized gifts, and pension loans (7, 8). However, these initiatives often require substantial budgets, posing challenges for countries with limited financial resources, such as low- and middle-income countries. Therefore, we recommend alternative strategies that can be implemented with more modest budgets. Highlighting retirees' accomplishments and enabling their continued involvement are crucial strategies for health policymakers, particularly in developing countries with restricted healthcare budgets.

One effective approach to honoring retirees is to highlight their accomplishments by sharing invaluable experiences which they gained over the decades of dedicated service. These experiences can provide valuable insights and guidance to younger individuals embarking on their careers in the same fields. To facilitate this, retirees' experiences can be recorded, classified and documented into video, audio, or written files. The retirees' preference for how they hand their experience and knowledge (via video, audio, or written documents) is also important. Additionally, periodic online or in person meetings can be arranged to tap into the expertise of retired individuals for the benefit of new employees. These files can be shared with current department heads, ensuring that the recorded experiences are easily accessible to younger individuals and others in related roles. Implementing this strategy creates a valuable information package which can enhance the quality of services which are provided by new healthcare workers. Additionally, it preserves the dignity of retirees, demonstrating that their experiences are highly regarded, considered valuable and will be used even after their retirement. This project incurs minimal costs for organizations, and can provide a valuable archive over time, documenting the retirees' experiences comprehensively and enduringly.

Another important strategy is to encourage the ongoing involvement of healthcare retirees within society. This can be achieved by creating opportunities for retired professionals to remain connected and engaged through mentorship programs, guest speaking engagements, or volunteering within healthcare organizations. Retirees' participation in the health policymaking think tanks can also be highly beneficial, as their experience, wisdom, and diverse perspectives can enhance decision-making for comprehensive and effective healthcare strategies. By leveraging their expertise and experience, retirees can contribute to the betterment of the community, reduce costs and make a positive impact in the field of healthcare.

Conclusion

Retired healthcare professionals often feel that they have been overlooked despite their past valuable contributions. Properly honoring retirees involves recognizing their ongoing worth and establishing their legacy in the healthcare system. This recognition ensures that their expertise continues to benefit others. This letter provides recommendations for enhancing retirees' experiences and highlights the benefits of their contributions to patients, colleagues, students, and healthcare managers. Additionally, it suggests conducting practical research to gain insights and address these issues effectively.
